Without culturally responsive, trauma-sensitive systems in place, adults struggle to address the social-emotional and behavioral needs of children, often relying upon exclusionary discipline that feeds the school-to-prison pipeline...

Nearly half of all children have been exposed to at least one adverse childhood experience (ACE), such as poverty, divorce, neglect, homelessness, substance abuse, domestic violence, war, persecution, or parent incarceration.

These students often enter school with behaviors that don't blend well with the typical school environment. How can a school and its community come together and work as a whole to establish a healthy social-emotional climate for children and the staff who support them?

Built on the a firm foundation of theory and theory in practice, part 1 of this 3 part online series, presents salient new research about the changed needs of today's children, introduces how and why ACEs negatively affect the learning process, and offers proven ways to provide a healthy environment for children and staff.

Join us as we develop the tools that helps our society move children away from the school-to-prison pipeline and towards a life rich with educational and career choices.

On Sept 1st, this discussion will be focused on ways we can continue to:

- Understand different experiences and unique obstacles children impacted by ACEs in urban, suburban, and rural schools, including suicidal tendencies, cyberbullying, and drugs
- Deepen our understanding of the impact of ACEs and trauma
- Gain tools to respectfully address cumulative and historical trauma
- Be introduced to culturally responsive, trauma-responsive interventions that foster connection, resilience, and success for children as well as educators
